Opioids Education Resource Collection: Call for Innovations and Best Practices

AAMC-member medical schools and teaching hospitals are on the front lines in our communities dealing with the opioid epidemic: responding with new approaches to prevent, identify, and treat pain and substance use disorders, delivering pain management and addiction education, and leading efforts in this area to advance medical research and promote innovations in clinical care.

To foster collaboration by educators and their partners to advance pain management, addiction medicine, and opioid education, the AAMC is launching a resource repository, featuring new approaches and best practices when it comes to improving how we teach and train. This curated resource collection allows for the agile sharing and disseminating of educational innovations.

We currently seek submissions for this curated resource collection of opioids education. Examples of appropriate resources may include checklists, worksheets, lesson plans, cases, or lecture outlines. To be successful included in the resource collection, submissions are required to:

- Address acute and chronic pain management and substance use disorders (including prevention, screening, intervention, treatment and long-term recovery).
- Include a structured cover sheet detailing the title of the activity, background on its development and implementation, lessons learned, and future directions.
- Be noncommercial resources for the teaching and health professions education and adhere to the Creative Commons license Attribution-NonCommercial.

All submissions will be reviewed to ensure criteria for acceptance has been achieved. To submit your resource: <https://icollaborative.aamc.org/submit>
