MEMORANDUM

TO: Western Region COD, GSA, GME, OSR and Curriculum Committee Members

FROM: Western Region Organization of Student Representatives (OSR)

SUBJ: Issues raised during the joint Fireside Chat with COD, GSA, GME and OSR at the 1989 Spring AAMC Western Regional Meeting

The OSR members of the Western Region really enjoyed the provocative discussion we recently had with the Medical Dean, Student Affairs Deans, and representatives of the Group on Medical Education at the AAMC meeting at Asilomar on Monday, April 24, 1989. We found the session to be most informative and stimulating, and look forward to continuing this tradition of discussing issues of mutual concern.

While minority recruitment and the declining applicant pool were expressed as major concerns, the large group gathered at the meeting that evening generally agreed that curriculum review was of the utmost importance. The following were identified as five key issues.

- (1) Need to define the product of the four years of medical school
Amidst a heated discussion about medical education, it became apparent that medical educators were unsure of exactly what we hoped to transform the ideal student into within four years of medical school. Without a clear definition of the "end-product" of the medical school process, it was hard to analyze or review the educational process itself.
- (2) Need to define the critical minimum of information (core material)
With the geometric explosion of information in medicine today, it was agreed that a concomitant expansion of curriculum could not be fit into the four-year medical school experience. It seemed imperative to identify "critical information and skills" that the medical student needed. This "core material" would then serve as a strong foundation with which the young physician could keep up with new medical breakthroughs during his or her lifetime.
- (3) Problem-oriented Examinations
Multiple-choice examinations encourage pattern recognition, not necessarily a knowledge of the concepts. Several faculty members reported that students frequently experience "intellectual bulimia" with bingeing and purging of facts around the time of examinations, and no recollection of these facts post-exam. The group felt that methods of evaluation that stressed problem-solving skills would be beneficial to students. Specifically, essay-type questions could be encouraged even if accompanied by transient shifts in National Board Scores, because effective communication and conversance with concepts would serve a student well in medicine.

(4) Reducing the Deleterious Effects of National Board Part I Scores on the Preclinical Curriculum

It is recognized that National Boards Part I, originally designed as a "licensure exam", measures several factors in addition to the student's knowledge of the basic sciences. For example, students from schools with a month off for "studying for the boards" with formal Board-review courses undoubtedly have a significant advantage over students given a week off with no structured review courses, often reflected in scores. Additionally, the overemphasis on Part I scores dictates the depth and focus of the preclinical curriculum in most medical schools, and leads to a dichotomy between the preclinical and clinical years with an inflexible preclinical curriculum with no room for growth. The group recognized the importance of a national form of medical student evaluation, but it was felt that other creative ways of evaluating a student's aptitude and knowledge for medicine should be pursued.

(5) Addressing the Psychosocial Aspects of Medicine

While medical schools aspire to train competent physicians with desirable personal "caring" qualities, the psychosocial aspects of medicine are frequently not addressed in the four-year medical school curriculum. It was felt that courses in Bioethics, Proper Bedside Manners, Social Aspects of Medicine, Diversity in the Patient Population and their different expectations of medical encounter, etc. are important components of the medical curriculum.

The discussion was unexpectedly lively and productive. Several other issues were discussed by this large audience, and some solutions were debated. Further comments on these issues would be welcomed and should be addressed to the OSR representative at your school; or to Wendy Pechacek, OSR Staff Director at the AAMC, at (202) 828-0681; or to Sheila Rege, Western Regional OSR Chair, at (213) 820-5128. Additionally, your local OSR representative will be meeting with you to discuss these issues.
