Identifying Organizational Readiness: Measuring Your Checklist Results
1	If most of your responses were in the 1 range, it is of dire importance to begin building your case for diversity and inclusion to gain organizational buy-in. You will need to assess the organizational climate for diversity and inclusion to identify the major challenges that must be made a priority in your planning. Gathering data that clearly shows the need for the diversity and inclusion initiative will win leadership support, as well.
2	If most of your responses were in the 2 range, it signifies that there has been or is currently some attempt to support diversity in the organization, yet the leadership and/or the majority of the organization are not yet fully grasping the significance of diversity and inclusion to the organization's success or are not truly "walking the walk" and modeling a commitment to diversity and inclusion. This may mean that diversity programming is more superficial and needs to focus more closely on the needs of the staff and the clients or communities served. Utilizing a diversity council to engage multiple individuals and departments across the organization can be instrumental in creating a more comprehensive initiative.
3	If most of your responses fell into the 3 range, you are most likely in the beginning phases of a potentially strong diversity initiative. It will be crucial to develop a strong and sustainable diversity plan aligned with the organization's strategic goals, and build a diversity council that has the strength and commitment to implement that plan.
4	If most of your responses fell into the 4 range, you probably have several strategies and processes in place that support diversity and inclusion. However, your organization may have hit a snag, or there may be a lack of momentum that is prohibiting progression to the next phase of growth. It will be important to reassess your processes, identify what promising practices have worked well and what challenges continue to hinder the organization. You may need to refresh your diversity council or provide some new learning opportunities.
5	If most of your responses fell in the 5 range, you are well on the way to a successful and sustainable diversity and inclusion initiative. It will be of utmost importance to maintain the momentum of this initiative and ensure that the individuals leading these efforts have the support they need to fully embed diversity and inclusion into the organizational culture.
